

Restaurant Sales Analysis

Using

Statistical Methods

Introduction:

Business background and context:

Running a successful restaurant means more than just making tasty food. It is about understanding what customers like, keeping up with trends, and making sure things run smoothly. Analyzing sales data is crucial for restaurant owners and managers to make smart decisions and improve how the restaurant operates.

In the restaurant business, success comes from adapting to change and knowing what customers want. Restaurant analysis is all about looking at various aspects of a restaurant's performance, like how much money it makes, what customers like, and how well things are running. This helps us to make better decisions and overall improves the restaurant's success.

In the ever-evolving restaurant business, embracing innovation is key to standing out. This involves not only experimenting with new menu items but also adopting technology for smoother operations, whether through online ordering systems or streamlined payment processes. The ability to blend tradition with modernity contributes to the restaurant's appeal and keeps it relevant to a diverse customer base.

Dataset Selection:

For analyzing restaurant sales, the dataset that provides a clear understanding of sales trends, identifies peak hours, detailed information on sales transactions, including transaction amounts, dates and information about menus is selected.

The dataset “Restaurant Sales Report” is downloaded from Kaggle.com. This dataset captures 1000 sales transactions from a local restaurant .It includes details such as the order ID, date of the transaction, item names (representing various food and beverage items), item types (categorized as Fast-food or Beverages), item prices, quantities ordered, transaction amounts, transaction types (cash, online, or others), the gender of the staff member who received the order, and the time of the sale (Morning, Evening, Afternoon, Night, Midnight). The dataset offers a valuable snapshot of the restaurant's daily operations and customer behavior.

1. underbid: a unique identifier for each order.
2. date: date of the transaction.

3. item name: name of the food.
4. item type: category of item (Fastfood or Beverages).
5. item price: price of the item for 1 quantity.
6. Quantity: how much quantity the customer orders.
7. transaction amount: the total amount paid by customers.
8. transaction type: payment method (cash, online, others).
9. received by gender of the person handling the transaction.
10. thimerosal: separate times of the day (Morning, Evening, Afternoon, Night, Midnight)

Data Cleaning and Transformation:

In the dataset analysis, it was observed that there were 107 missing values in the "transaction type" variable, which is a categorical variable representing whether the transaction was conducted in cash or online. To address these missing values, a decision was made to replace them with the value "cash," as this mode of transaction was the most frequently observed in the available data. This imputation approach aims to maintain the integrity of the dataset and ensure that the analysis considers the predominant transaction type in the absence of specific information for those instances. The examination of outliers for both quantity and item price reveals the absence of outliers, as depicted in Figure 1.

Correlation:

Correlation Plot between Item price and Quantity

The dataset was examined to assess the correlation between the item price and quantity variables. The analysis revealed a low correlation between these two variables, with a correlation coefficient of 0.05. This indicates a weak linear relationship between item price and quantity; changes in one variable are not strongly associated with proportional changes in the other. Understanding this correlation helps in interpreting how variations in item prices correspond to changes in quantities sold, providing valuable insights for further analysis in the context of restaurant sales.

Research questions:

- Can we identify the peak hours during which the restaurant experiences the highest sales, and how do sales vary during these peak hours?
- How do sales differ between Fast-food and Beverages categories, and are there specific times or days when one category outperforms the other?
- Does the customer's gender impact sales?
- Analyzing to find out whether there is any linear relationship between item price, quantity and received by.

Data Analysis:

In the analysis of sales data considering the time of sale, item price, and item type frequency, interesting patterns emerged and are shown in Figure 2. Notably:

Item Price Analysis: The item priced at 20 units (currency) had the highest sales frequency, despite being the least expensive. This suggests that lower-priced items may have broader appeal or are positioned as attractive options to customers.

Item Type Analysis: Fast food items were the most frequently purchased, indicating a high demand for this category. The popularity of fast-food items could be attributed to factors such as convenience, quick service, or specific customer preferences for these offerings. The fast food items are more sold in night times.

Time of Sale Analysis: Sales were notably higher during the afternoon and night hours. This indicates that more customers tend to make purchases during these times, suggesting potential peak periods for the restaurant. Understanding these patterns can help optimize staffing levels and marketing strategies during high-traffic hours. The fast foods are more often preferred by the customers in the peak hours especially sandwiches.

Gender Wise Sale Analysis: Customers of both genders demonstrate a preference for fast foods over beverages, thereby contributing to an overall higher total sales volume for fast food items and is shown in the dashboard.

Linear Regression:

Linear regression is performed with quantity as the dependent variable, utilizing item price as a continuous predictor and item type and received by as categorical predictors. It is used to predict the quantity of the item ordered based on the value of predictors.

Results:

In the context of the linear regression analysis provided in the model summary, the null hypothesis (H_0) typically represents the assumption that there is no significant relationship between the dependent variable (quantity) and the independent variables (item price, item type, received by) whereas alternative hypothesis states that there is a significant relationship between the dependent variable and independent variables and is shown below in the Table 1.

RMSE:

H₀: The RMSE for the null model is 4.413, representing the average difference between observed and predicted quantity when considering no predictors.

H₁: The alternative model's slightly lower RMSE of 4.407 indicates a marginal improvement in prediction accuracy compared to the null model. However, this improvement is exceedingly small.

R²:

The null hypothesis suggests that the predictors have no impact on the quantity of items sold, leading to a model with no explanatory power (R²=0.000).

The alternative hypothesis argues that there is some linear relationship, albeit weak, between the predictors and the quantity of items sold (R²=0.006).

Table 2: Model Coefficients

The presented results in the table are from the Coefficients section of a linear regression model, and they provide information about the relationships between the predictors and the dependent variable (quantity) and are shown in Table 2.

Model Coefficients:

H₀ (Intercept):

The intercept (8.162) in the null model represents the estimated quantity when all predictors are zero. The extremely low p-value ($< .001$) indicates that this intercept is significantly different from zero.

H₁ (Intercept):

The intercept (8.077) in the alternative model represents the estimated quantity when all predictors (item price, item type, received by) are zero. This intercept is also significantly different from zero ($p < .001$).

Coefficient of item price:

The coefficient (0.015) for item price indicates the expected change in quantity for a one-unit increase in item price. However, the associated p-value (0.099) is greater than the conventional significance level (e.g., 0.05), suggesting that the effect of item price on quantity is not statistically significant.

Coefficient of item type (Fastfood):

For the categorical predictor item type with the level "Fastfood," the coefficient (-0.367) suggests a decrease in quantity compared to the reference category. However, the p-value (0.222) is greater than 0.05, indicating that this effect is not statistically significant.

Coefficient of received by (Mrs.):

For the categorical predictor received by with the level "Mrs.," the coefficient (-0.364) suggests a decrease in quantity compared to the reference category. Like item type, the p-value (0.192) is greater than 0.05, indicating that this effect is not statistically significant.

Given that none of the predictors are statistically significant, we may need to reconsider the chosen predictors or explore additional variables that could better explain variations in sales quantity. The lack of statistical significance suggests that the current model may not be the most effective in predicting or understanding the factors influencing sales quantity. Refinement or alternative modeling approaches may be necessary. Further investigation into other potential predictors or interactions between variables may provide deeper insights into the dynamics of sales quantity in the business context.

Given the lack of statistical significance in the previous model, it is suggested to choose quantity and item price as predictors to establish a more robust model² for predicting total sales and its coefficients are shown in Table³. This selection is expected to yield statistically significant values, indicating that total sales are dependent on both item price and quantity. Both quantity and item price are positively correlated to total sales as the quantity and item price increases the total sales increases.

Business insights:

The initial model lacked significant predictors, suggesting a need for reconsideration or exploration of additional variables. To address this, a new model using quantity and item price as predictors is proposed, demonstrating their statistically significant impact on total sales, with both quantity and item price positively correlated to total sales.

Dashboard:

The Sandwich stands out with higher sales compared to other items. Both male and female customers exhibit a preference for fast foods over beverages, contributing to an overall higher total sale for fast food items. Notably, fast foods are more popular during nighttime compared to daytime, as highlighted in the above dashboard.

Recommendations:

- Consider offering combo packs or special promotions that include beverages along with fast food items. This strategy could boost beverage sales, especially considering the currently low performance in comparison to fast food.
- Adapa, Pani Puri, and Aalop Uri experience lower sales compared to other items in the fast-food category. To address this issue, gather feedback from customers to gain insights into the reasons behind the low popularity of these items. Utilize the gathered information to implement essential improvements or modifications.
- Daytime sales lag nighttime sales, suggesting an opportunity for improvement. To boost daytime fast-food sales, consider introducing innovative menu items. Additionally, propose enticing combo deals that pair fast food with beverages, aiming to elevate overall daytime sales.

Conclusion:

In conclusion, the analysis of the "Restaurant Sales Report" dataset has yielded insightful findings for optimizing restaurant performance. Notable patterns include the popularity of lower-priced items and the dominance of fast foods, particularly the Sandwich. Peak sales hours were identified in the afternoon and night, guiding strategic decisions for staffing and marketing. The linear regression analysis indicated statistically significant predictors which gives better understanding factors influencing sales quantity. Business recommendations include promoting combo deals to boost beverage sales, addressing the lower popularity of specific fast-food items through customer feedback, and leveraging innovation and enticing combos to enhance daytime sales. Adaptation to customer trends and a blend of tradition with modernity are emphasized for sustained success in the ever-evolving restaurant industry.
